Comments: We offer a link to IHEA Online but have no method of tracking who utilizes it but I think it is very few. I am currently developing our own online program as the IHEA (even with the ability to customize) is very limited. True interactive learning, entertains the young audience and provides a greatly reduced learning curve (50% of traditional time spent in training.)

Comments: To-date as the year is not complete October 2006. The IHEA course is referred to as an additional reference material for any student who may wish to see the subject matter. It is not used as part of the curriculum. An estimate would be 6 to 12 students a year may use all or part of the information on the website. These numbers represent the students who registered and completed a test. Others may down-load the information and not register. These hits are a greater number (over 1700 since 2004). These can be multiple downloads from the same person or fictitious names. Approximately 70% are from New Brunswick.

Comments: California uses both the IHEA custom online Hunter Education course and the online course offered by Today's Hunter. Their records don't differentiate between the two classes. Upon completion of the online course, the student attends a four-hour review and certification course with a Hunter Education instructor. Since all California Hunter Education instructors do not offer the four-hour review and certification, students are encouraged to find an instructor within their geographical area prior to completing the online course. Online course started January 1, 2006.

Comments: Due to the resistance of hunter education instructors to use electronic media, an online course is currently not being used for the public. However, individuals born prior to 1/1/1967 who require a hunter education card to purchase a license in other states are able to take the IHEA online course and send in the 14 completed tests along with a copy of a previous hunting license and their drivers license to get a Delaware hunter education card. Delaware plans to implement the IHEA online course in the coming year.

Comments: MA recommends the IHEA online course to anyone who is looking for an introduction to HE or for a refresher course. We have also piloted alternative delivery for the past three years and give the students the option of using either the IHEA online course or a workbook. We have not kept track of what they use. The number of students who have completed HE using the alternative format is under 50 students each year. We do not recommend any other online course.

Comments: New York's data does not identify home study vs. traditional courses until about a year ago, and even now the numbers don't differentiate between home study workbooks and computer-based courses. As a result, numbers will be estimates as to how many students used paper home study vs. computer-based.

The online course has tremendous promise, but it started out slow in NY because of several factors that we are just overcoming this year, and the numbers we have are mostly from LAST year. The problems that we are just not getting over are:

1. Instructor resistance to home study for two main reasons:

- a. Reluctance ANY change in course delivery after decades of great success with traditional hunter education.
- b. "UN-learning" that person-to-person interactive teaching is THE ONLY effective way to deliver hunter education.

RESULT: Some parts of the state now have online courses, and some still don't.

2. Technical time lag -- Many people are reluctant to devote hours to online study for a couple of reasons we have heard:

- a. Dial-up connections -- the adoption of high-speed internet connections has been slower than anticipated (cost being a commonly-cited factor). As a result, most people with dial-up connections can't tie up phone lines long enough for home study.

- b. One member of a large family "hogging" the computer in demand by other family members.

RESULT: As more people get high-speed connections and more than one computer per household, these problems decrease.

Acceptance of the online started out disappointingly slow, but it is just now picking up momentum. Most of the problem was our inability to make rapid changes in a big program. We could not "push" it with advertising until we have enough instructors willing to try it. As the instructors who are willing to try new things finally have an effect on those who are not so eager to change, the public will tell us how much they like it.

Comments: These are the total number of students for Ohio by Fiscal Year. We do not have a good way to separate out the number of students that use the alternative delivery methods. We use our own internet type course as well as distributing the manuals to those folks without internet access. Ohio has experienced the same problems as New York in regards to “buy-in” by our instructors for Home Study courses. That being said we have not promoted it to any great extent. What follows is a table with total students trained as well as the numbers of each type of course. Usually our Home Study courses have smaller numbers of students, but not always.

Comments: Washington State does not use the IHEA online course or other IHEA study materials. We have been using independent study materials for more than a decade, we only entered the world of online learning in 2006.

Comments: The students are not segregated in our electronic records; so I really don't know the answers. What I can say is the online program is far more popular and in demand than we can support. Our instructors are simply reluctant to do this type of training on the whole. We have pockets of instructors that are doing them and they could fill up nearly every weekend of the year I believe. Annually we certify about 32,000 students here in Wisconsin.

Comments: Wyoming requires completion of the 14 lessons and exams from the IHEA course. Upon completion of the 14 lessons, students are required to complete 5 additional modules of Wyoming specific training.
